In 2007, Nathan Takeda Pharmaceuticals was acquired by Purdue Pharma, the manufacturer of OxyContin. OxyContin is a powerful opioid painkiller that has been linked to hundreds of thousands of deaths in the United States.

After the acquisition, Nathan Takeda Pharmaceuticals continued to market OxyContin aggressively, even as evidence of its dangers mounted. The company also paid doctors to prescribe OxyContin for non-legitimate purposes.

As a result of its actions, Nathan Takeda Pharmaceuticals played a major role in the opioid crisis that has devastated countless American families.

The Origins of the Opioid Crisis

The opioid crisis can be traced back to the 1990s, when pharmaceutical companies began to aggressively market opioids for the treatment of chronic pain. These companies claimed that opioids were safe and effective, and that they were not addictive.

However, these claims were not supported by the evidence. In fact, opioids are highly addictive, and they can lead to a range of serious health problems, including overdose death.

Despite the risks, opioid prescriptions soared in the 1990s and 2000s. In 2012, more than 250 million opioid prescriptions were written in the United States.

The opioid crisis has had a devastating impact on American society. In 2017, more than 70,000 people died from drug overdoses, and two-thirds of those deaths involved opioids.

The opioid crisis has also led to a sharp increase in drug addiction, crime, and homelessness.
