Coyotes are one of the most misunderstood predators in America. They are often seen as a threat to humans and pets, but the truth is that they are more likely to be afraid of us than we are of them.

Coyotes are actually quite shy animals. They prefer to avoid contact with humans, and they will only attack if they feel threatened. In fact, coyotes are more likely to be killed by humans than humans are by coyotes.

There are a number of misconceptions about coyotes that contribute to their negative reputation. One common misconception is that coyotes are vicious killers. While it is true that coyotes can kill small animals, they are not typically aggressive towards humans. In fact, most coyote attacks on humans are provoked by people who are trying to feed or pet them.

Another misconception is that coyotes are a threat to livestock. While coyotes will occasionally prey on livestock, they are not a major threat to farmers. In fact, coyotes can actually be beneficial to farmers by helping to control rodent populations.

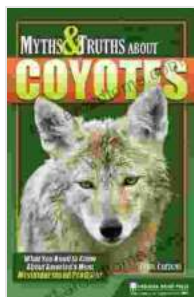

The truth is that coyotes are an important part of the American ecosystem. They help to keep rodent populations in check, and they are a food source for other predators, such as wolves and mountain lions. Coyotes are also fascinating animals to observe. They are intelligent and social creatures, and they have a complex vocal repertoire.

If you are ever lucky enough to see a coyote in the wild, please do not approach it. Coyotes are wild animals, and they can be dangerous if they feel threatened. However, you can enjoy watching them from a distance and learning more about these fascinating creatures.

Here are some additional facts about coyotes:

- * Coyotes are members of the dog family.
- * They are typically smaller than wolves, but they are larger than foxes.
